Korda's win streak numbers spectacular

Beth Ann Nichols
Golfweek | USA TODAY NETWORK

When Nelly Korda tees it up starting today at the Cognizant Founders Cup in Clifton, New Jersey, at Upper Montclair Country Club, she seeks to accomplish something that's never been done on the LPGA — win a sixth consecutive start.

Only two other players have won five consecutive starts on the LPGA: Nancy Lopez in her magical rookie season of 1978, and Annika Sorenstam spanning from the end of the 2004 season to the first three events of 2005.

In their sixth starts Sorenstam tied for 12th at the Michelob Open at King-smill in 2005 while Lopez took a share of 13th at the Lady Keystone Open.

After her victory at the season's first major, the Chevron Championship, Korda became the first American to win five tournaments in one year since Juli Inkster in 1999.

When it comes to world rankings,

Korda leads the tour by a country mile. Her 12.30 points average in the Rolex Rankings is nearly double that of No. 2 Lilia Vu's average of 6.54.

In the Race to CME Globe Season standings, Korda's 2,702 points total is more than double that of second place Lydia Ko at 1,142. Korda, by the way, took off the entire spring Asian swing during a seven-week break from the tour.

There are so many ways to measure Korda's dominance. Here are a few more:

The overall record

Korda's record in six LPGA starts this season is a staggering 507-20-1 in stroke-play events. (She went 3-0 in the match-play portion of the T-Mobile event at Shadow Creek in Vegas.)

Korda lost to 15 players at the season-opening Tournament of Champions and finished sixth in the stroke-play portion of T-Mobile after 54 holes. The top eight players advanced to match play.

Strokes gained brilliance

Since starting her streak at the LPGA Drive On, Korda has gained a whopping 3.60 strokes per round on the competition, according to KPMG Performance Insights. That does not include Korda's three match-play victories in Las Vegas.

For the season, Korda leads the tour in strokes gained around the greens and greens in regulation, hitting 76%.

Room for improvement

KPMG stats guru Justin Ray broke down Korda's work on the greens, which by all accounts has been stronger this season.

Even so, Ray says she has one of the lowest putt-make percentages from 5 to 10 feet on tour. She also ranks 102nd on tour in one-putts per round.

"Her ball-striking prowess is such that she easily overcomes a miscue or two per round on the greens," Ray wrote for LPGA.com.

Scoring average

Korda's scoring average during the streak is 68.74, and that includes some brutal weather on the West Coast and major championship conditions.

Korda also is 46 under par on the par 5s alone, dating back to the Drive On.

For the season, Korda leads the tour in par-5 scoring (4.43) and par-4 scoring (3.93) and ranks 74th in par-3 scoring (3.09).

So far this season on the LPGA circuit, 16 of her 26 rounds have been in the 60s, a 62% clip.

Youngest to . . .

The LPGA is now a young person's tour, there's no question about it. And at age 25, Korda became the youngest American player to win two major titles since Juli Inkster managed the feat at age 24 in 1984. Amy Alcott won two majors by age 24 in 1980.

LPGA needs to ace shot amid boom in women's sports

Dan Wolken
Columnist
USA TODAY

On Sunday, April 21, a peak audience of 1.9 million people tuned in to NBC and watched Nelly Korda record her fifth consecutive tournament victory at the Chevron Championship, the first major of the LPGA season.

It's not a Caitlin Clark rating, but for a sport that has been plagued by poor television coverage, lack of breakthrough stars and questionable management, it was one of the better days women's golf has seen in quite some time.

In theory, the LPGA should be in prime position to reap some of the benefits being generated by the recent surge of interest in women's sports.

For one thing, their counterparts on the men's tour have turned off scores of fans thanks to the interminable struggle between the PGA Tour and LIV Golf and the odious greed driving so much division and dissatisfaction.

After years of unfairly blaming the prominence of Asian players for struggling to connect with stateside audiences, the LPGA now has a 25-year-old American from a prominent sporting family dominating the sport.

And given that the Summer Olympics are looming in Paris, where Korda will be defending her gold medal from Tokyo three years ago, this should be one of the easiest sales jobs women's golf will ever have to generate real, enduring new interest in what has always been a very good and watchable product.

The door is open.

There are no excuses.

The time is now.

But is women's golf truly ready for this moment?

I'm not so sure.

Up until now, three things have been undeniably true about women's golf and its struggle to break through outside of its small, niche fan base:

Nelly Korda is going for her sixth LPGA win in a row at this week's Cognizant Founders Cup in New Jersey.
THOMAS SHEA/
USA TODAY SPORTS

- The LPGA has failed to craft a compelling narrative for why people should watch, outside the mere fact of its existence.

- Some of its stars, including Korda prominently, haven't gone above and beyond to promote the game and make themselves familiar to large audiences.

- And television has struggled to give the product its due, both in terms of exposure and quality of broadcast.

The third point, in particular, was disappointing at the first major. While NBC should be given credit for putting the Chevron on its over-the-air network and not stuffing it on Peacock or the Golf Channel, it was jarring to flip between the LPGA and the concurrent PGA Tour event shown on CBS.

While the latter featured sharp graphics, high-tech camera angles and shot-tracing gizmos that are now standard in men's golf broadcasts, the NBC coverage looked like a penny-pinching, outdated endeavor — the bare minimum to get these women on TV.

At a time when we're now used to a women's basketball broadcast on ABC or ESPN looking and feeling the exact same as a men's broadcast, it was actually jarring to turn on NBC and see something that was so technically inferior to what the same network does when it shows The Players or the U.S. Open men's tournaments.

And because NBC clearly didn't devote as many camera crews as it would have for a men's major championship, it couldn't show much of what was happening in the groups ahead of Korda. As a result, the broadcast felt like it dragged along at a glacial pace because there just wasn't much action in-between Korda's shots.

While NBC may be happy with the rating and proud of giving women's golf an opportunity to be shown on network TV, it should be embarrassed by the way it presented the product. The magnitude of Korda's achievement and the moment for the LPGA were simply not done proper justice.

But this is more than a TV issue.

Korda has been a potential gold mine for the LPGA ever since she won her first event at age 20, but she has been known for being quite discerning about how much time she's willing to spend doing the kind of extra promotional work that the sport badly needs.

Whether you attribute it to her preference for privacy or wanting to focus only on the birdies and bogeys, the reality is that it's hard for women's golf to maximize this moment when its biggest star is not known to be particularly media-friendly or willing to promote something other than her golf swing.

It was interesting before the Chevron that Stacy Lewis, a two-time major winner, said point-blank that Korda had a responsibility to be more visible and more accessible in service of the LPGA.

"Every week, she needs to be in here (with the media) talking about it and talking about how good she's playing, and I don't know what that's going to be, what that looks like for her," Lewis said. "I've been in her shoes, I've been No. 1 in the world, I've been the top American and you're asked to do a lot of things."

"But give the media a couple hours every week. That's what she's going to have to start doing. But her playing great golf, that's what pushes us more forward than anything."

It was notable that Korda, shortly after her Chevron victory, showed up for a brief chat on the "No Laying Up" podcast that is particularly popular with younger golf fans. That was a positive step. As was her appearance Monday evening on the red carpet at the Met Gala in New York.

On the other hand, it wasn't so great that Korda pulled out of the immediate next tournament, the JM Eagle LA Championship, citing exhaustion from winning four events in five weeks.

While it's hard to criticize athletes for being cautious with their schedule and their body, it's also true that Korda skipped the LPGA's Asian swing in February and early March. Barring an injury, there's an argument to be made that Korda should have at least tried to give it a go as the LPGA stopped in the nation's second-biggest media market.

The responsibility on star women's athletes to both perform and promote can often seem unfair, and maybe it is. Does Scottie Scheffler get the same scrutiny for how many media and promotional commitments he takes on or which tournaments he skips?

That's a legitimate conversation, but if the LPGA and its players aspire to capitalize on the wave of enthusiasm for women's sports and Korda's historic streak, they need to show more readiness than we've seen so far.

Korda needs to do better.

The LPGA needs to do better.

And television networks definitely need to do better.
