Pac-12

physically than the rest of the country knows because most people are sleeping when we play, and the coaching is really, really good."

The four Sweet 16 berths this year are the most ever for the conference.

The achievement this season is notable given the disadvantage West Coast schools faced. COVID-19 concerns in those states led to much of the summer activities being lost, as other conferences had players on campus and could oversee workout regimens.

The Pac-12's success over the first weekend of the tournament can't be written off on easy brackets. The paths haven't been easy, partly because the tournament committee wasn't high on any of the teams.

Oregon, the regular-season champion, somehow was a No. 7 seed, yet blew away one of the Big Ten's top dogs in No. 2 seed Iowa. Southern California, which finished second in the league and was seeded fifth, wiped out Big 12 standard-bearer Kansas, a No. 3 seed.

Oregon State and UCLA started as double-digit seeds. The Beavers took down Tennessee and Oklahoma State in impressive fashion. The Bruins had to beat Michigan State in a First Four game, BYU and then Abilene Christian.

Colorado, the league's highest seed at No. 5, is the only team out. The Buffaloes made the conference tournament final before losing to Oregon State, which got the Beavers in the field.

Compare those seedings with the Big 12 and Big Ten, which had five teams seeded No. 4 or better. The ACC had two.

So it's no surprise there's a feeling of lack of respect, especially given the recent tournament success of the league. Three times in the past six tournaments it had three Sweet 16 teams. Oregon made the Final Four in 2017.

The slights have forged an unlikely bond among the coaches.

"We have really come together as a group of coaches these last couple of years because we are tired of it," Oregon State coach Wayne Tinkle said. "I would have never guessed getting texts from multiple coaches after we won the tournament, the Pac-12 tournament.

"Then the support after the win the other night. ... We need to go to bat for each other. Yeah, we want to kick each other's ass when we go head-to-head. But let's pull for each other."

USC coach Andy Enfield echoed those thoughts when asked how the Trojans were handling their downtime with mobility limited in Indianapolis.

"We've really enjoyed watching the Pac-12 win all these tournament games," Enfield said. "That's how we keep ourselves entertained. We're locked up in our rooms, we just turn the tournament on, watch the Pac-12 do well."

The only thing stopping all four teams from reaching the Elite Eight?

Oregon and USC are in the same half of the West regional. The Ducks and Trojans will play Sunday in an unfortunate scheduling quirk. Typically, conference teams avoid each other before the regional finals.

The bright side? At least one will be advancing.

The other two have good chances. UCLA faces Alabama but seems to have found an identity during its three-game run. Oregon State faces Loyola Chicago with an opportunity to reach its first Elite Eight since 1992.

"Our league has done great, and I hope we can keep it up," Oregon coach Dana Altman said.

Vaccine

The Atlanta Hawks and Portland Trail Blazers did so, essentially, in their own locker room: Fourteen of 17 Hawks players and 36 basketball operations members overall were vaccinated after a March 19 game; all who were vaccinated met Georgia standards to qualify for the vaccine, which for players included a body mass index exceeding 25.

Monday, the Blazers announced 13 players received their first dose of the Moderna vaccine, gaining access, they said in a statement, to an "excess supply of vaccines through the Confederated Tribes of Grand Ronde who began offering the vaccine to the general public in February as a way to help Oregon, and the Nation, move past the pandemic."

Multiple New Orleans Pelicans players were vaccinated March 14, days after some eligibility restrictions were loosened in Louisiana.

Older coaches and managers, such as the San Antonio Spurs' Gregg Popovich (who turned 72 in January) and Houston Astros' Dusty Baker (71), have confirmed their vaccinations.

As for the 800 to 1,000 MLB players about to disperse coast to coast for a summer-long tour of America?

According to a baseball official with direct knowledge of MLB's thinking, vaccinations will be state-based and handled on a team-by-team basis. The league will strongly urge, but not require, players and staff to get vaccinated once state regulations allow access.

The person spoke to USA TODAY Sports on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to discuss the policies publicly.

Production and distribution of the vaccine have ramped up far quicker than the proliferation and processing of COVID-19 tests, the biggest hurdle to sports' return in the early months of the COVID-19 pandemic.

Testing presented dilemmas both functional and moral — the NBA, NHL and WNBA's bulletproof bubbles and MLB's bumpy but ultimately successful uncontrolled environment required daily, rapid testing at a time the coronavirus ravaged the country and thousands of Americans' test results were rendered useless due to lengthy processing times.

The path to vaccination has been smoother.

Andy Slavitt, White House senior adviser for COVID-19 response, said over the weekend that two-thirds of seniors have been vaccinated. President Joe Biden's goal to open vaccinations to all Americans 16 and older by May 1 has been adopted by 24 states. Yet that goal was admittedly conservative, allowing states to create their own, more aggressive timelines.

And they have: The governors of Michigan, Connecticut and Iowa — two Democrats and a Republican — announced an April 5 opening of vaccines to all residents 16 and older. Arizona's Doug Ducey, a Republican, did them one better, pushing that date to March 24.

Cities and counties have taken matters into their own hands, too, with Orlando Mayor Jerry Demings opening a mass vaccination site at his city's convention center for residents 40 and older, drawing the ire of Florida Gov. Ron DeSantis.

The shifting guidelines come as some vaccine batches go unused and concern over COVID-19 variants grow.

Roberts says the highly contagious United Kingdom variant is responsible for more than 60% of recent cases among students and staff at South Florida.

"We need to stop these variants," she says. "And to do that, we have to vaccinate the spreaders."

That's not to say those eligible will offer up their arm for a shot.

"I don't really see myself getting it any time soon, unless I'm forced to," Golden State Warriors forward Andrew Wiggins said Monday night.

Hours earlier Los Angeles Dodgers third baseman Justin Turner — best known to casual fans as the guy who

Mr. and Mrs. Met at the opening of Citi Field as a vaccination site in February. DAVID DEE DELGADO/GETTY IMAGES broke isolation and celebrated, maskless, a World Series title with teammates minutes after receiving a positive COVID-19 test result — sounded less than effusive about backing up whatever antibodies he may possess with a vaccine.

"I definitely will think about it. I still have the antibodies," says Turner, who tested positive Oct. 27.

"There are some conversations with the training staff on the pros and cons about getting it or waiting to see how long my antibodies last, so I don't know yet."

"It's a personal decision. It's not up to me to talk about what guys are going to do and not going to do."

Plenty of guys who have labored under coronavirus outbreaks and protocols are hoping relief comes quickly and willingly; after 11 MLB stadiums played host to mass vaccination sites, some shots should soon land in the arms of those who perform inside them.

"I look at us just like the rest of the country — the more people that (get vaccinated), the more comfortable people are," says Miami Marlins manager Don Mattingly, whose team lost 18 players to positive COVID-19 tests just days into the 2020 season, as he clutched his neck gaiter. "Would love to not have these things on all day long, in my office, everywhere else."

"I think we just want, as an industry, and as a country, that we get on top of this, we're safer, people are more comfortable. I'm sure everybody would like to have something in their life to improve upon with COVID."
