Minimum wage hikes a pandemic lifeline

States and municipalities are set to increase pay

Small Business
Rhonda Abrams
USA TODAY

While millions of Americans are losing financial assistance that has kept them afloat during the coronavirus pandemic, several states and 21 localities are partly offsetting the pain with a different kind of lifeline: minimum wage hikes.

On Wednesday, Illinois, Nevada and Oregon are set to raise their pay floors as part of large increases that are being phased in over several years, according to the National Employment Law Project, a worker advocacy group.

The minimum wage in Illinois will rise to $10 an hour from $9.25, the state's second increase this year. On Jan. 1, its minimum increased from $8.25, meaning the state's base hourly pay will have jumped nearly $2 in just six months.

In Nevada, the minimum wage will increase to $8 from $7.25 for workers with health insurance, and to $9 from $8.25 for those without health coverage.

In Oregon, the hourly pay floor will increase to $12 from $11.25, while Portland's base climbs to $13.25 from $12.50.

Eighteen municipalities – including 13 in California – and three counties also are boosting their pay minimums Wednesday. The standard will go up to $15 from $14 in Washington, D.C.; to as much as $15 (for large employers) from $14.25 in Los Angeles; to as much as $13.25 (for large employers) from $12.25 in Minneapolis; and to $16.07 from $15.59 in San Francisco as part of an annual cost-of-living increase, NELP figures show.

The increases had been scheduled before the pandemic but they're poised to help restaurant, retail and other low-paid workers hit hardest by state shutdowns of nonessential businesses. Although many lost their jobs and are now receiving unemployment benefits, others saw their hours reduced and minimum wage hikes can help ease their financial struggles, says NELP policy analyst Yannet Lathrop.

Other financial assistance programs are phasing out. A $600 weekly federal supplement to state jobless benefits is scheduled to end July 31. Some states are allowing landlords to evict tenants for nonpayment of rent now that moratoriums have expired. And Americans must pay their income taxes by July 15 after the deadline was pushed back from April 15.

A minimum wage increase "makes even more sense at a time of economic uncertainty," Lathrop says. "When you put money in the pockets of these workers, they're going to spend it right away." That can lift an economy hammered by the deepest recession since the Great Depression in the second quarter.

"More money in the pockets of workers means more consumer spending at local businesses," says Holly Sklar, CEO of Business for a Fair Minimum Wage.

The base pay increases also should aid essential workers who stayed on the job and endured health risks during the crisis. Several retailers, including Amazon, Rite Aid and Kroger, paid premiums of about $2 an hour to those front-line workers to compensate them for those risks. But they rolled back hazard pay last month.

All told, 24 states and 48 cities and counties have raised or will bump up their minimum wages this year, with most occurring on or about Jan. 1. Just a few years ago, a $15 minimum was the seemingly quixotic goal of a national coalition of fast food workers, but the number of cities and counties already at that benchmark is set to double to 32.

Meanwhile, the federal minimum wage has been stuck at $7.25 an hour since 2009, with Republicans refusing to take up Democratic legislation to raise it. Twenty-nine states, with more than 60% of the U.S. workforce, now have pay floors above the federal government's, according to the NELP.

ASK HUMAN RESOURCES

If you want a promotion, beware of self-serving bias

Johnny C. Taylor
Columnist
USA TODAY

Johnny C. Taylor Jr., a human resources expert, is tackling your questions as part of a series for USA TODAY. Taylor is president and CEO of the Society for Human Resource Management, the world's largest HR professional society.

The questions are submitted by readers, and Taylor's answers below have been edited for length and clarity.

Question: I've been working overtime at my job ever since my manager left. I've been tasked with doing (my manager's) job on top of my own, however, I haven't received a raise or promotion and I feel undervalued. How can I talk to my new manager about this? – Anonymous

Johnny C. Taylor Jr.: If you're working overtime and feeling undervalued, you should certainly talk to your new manager. But before you do, take some time to reflect. What do you really want? A raise? Or a promotion? You might think "either would be fine!" However, I strongly encourage you to clearly define your goal. That way, you can build a strategy and pick the tactics most likely to help you make it happen.

Regardless of your goal, be mindful of our economic context during your conversation. While there is absolutely nothing wrong with asking for a raise or promotion, there are millions of Americans without a job right now. This makes tact an essential part of your approach. Yes, advocate for yourself. But strike the right tone and avoid sounding ungrateful.

One good way to ground yourself is to be realistic about your workload and performance. I say this because we, as human beings, have the habit of looking at ourselves through rose-colored glasses while seeing everything and everyone else in a less flattering light. In fact, this mental filter is called the self-serving bias, which is our "tendency to attribute positive events to (our) own character but attribute negative events to external factors." In other words, overconfidence is common, which is why it's always wise to stay humble, self-aware, and be prepared.

Being prepared means doing the research to get the numbers that support your points. What you've done and how hard you've worked are good things to note. But it's even better – especially if a promotion is your goal – to highlight how your work has:

- Implemented business strategy
- Produced bottom-line results.

You'll also want to put yourself in your employer's shoes: We're enduring an unprecedented pandemic. So, consider the state of the business and whether the organization can afford to provide a raise or promotion at present. Granted, if your company is in a tough spot right now, that's not to say you shouldn't start this conversation. It's an FYI that a "no" could very well have nothing to do with the value you bring to the organization. It could, quite simply, come down to dollars and cents.

That said, if you don't get what you hoped for, don't miss the bright side. You're taking on new responsibilities and learning skills that develop you as a professional. And that will pay off one day, be it within your company or with another one.

Question: What's the deal with vacation policy during COVID? I want to take paid time off, but I feel weird about it since we're working from home. I'm worried my boss already sees this as "vacation" even though I'm working hard. Am I still entitled to my PTO? –Anonymous

Taylor: I've been asked this question quite a few times, and increasingly so as the weather started warming up this spring. After all, summer is typically the time that many American workers take vacations.

I'll start with this: Paid time off (PTO) is subject to employer discretion. This means the final say on whether, and when, employees can take time off or not. There are some exceptions, such as state and local paid sick leave laws but, in general, your employer has the right to grant or refuse PTO.

Now, as for your situation, why are you worried about asking? Has your boss denied a recent request? Or, explicitly said you or others can't take a vacation during this time? If the answer is no, then my answer is simple. Start an open and honest conversation with your manager – and request time off.

When you do, don't feel guilty. Sure, you and many others are working from home. But I don't know any leaders who think that is anything like a vacation. Speaking for myself, I know telework can blur the lines between the workplace and home, and that means some of us end up working even more than we did before the outbreak.

Similarly, keep in mind that PTO is truly a benefit for both employers and employees. Time away from the office (even if that office is home) enables employees to unplug and refresh.

That said, depending on your industry, taking time off right now could be infeasible. Or, maybe other colleagues have already requested those same dates off, and your organization needs to ensure PTO is taken in a staggered fashion. In either case, you should still start the conversation now as it could help pin down some dates you could take off.

Hopefully, you're feeling less worried now. And find yourself on vacation soon!
