NCAA revenue back to $1.15 billion in 2021

Steve Berkowitz
USA TODAY

The NCAA had $1.155 billion in total revenue for its 2021 fiscal year, as its finances returned to nearly normal conditions after the COVID-19 pandemic forced the cancellation of the 2020 Division I men's basketball tournament, the association's new audited financial statement shows.

But the statement, which the association released Wednesday, still shows the impacts of the pandemic, the association's steps to manage those impacts and the potential for major problems if another surge in the virus affects this season's basketball tournaments.

In 2020, the NCAA's revenue dropped by $600 million because of the men's tournament's cancellation – and that was with the association collecting $270 million from a loss-of-revenue insurance policy designed to cover the tournament.

In 2021, according to the new statement's notes, the NCAA again had such coverage in place – and it paid out $81 million “related to reduced ticket sales and additional costs for COVID-19 precautions” as the men's tournament was played entirely in Indiana and the women's tournament entirely in Texas. Normally, the events are played at venues across the nation.

Now, however: “The NCAA's loss of revenue insurance expired at the end of fiscal-year 2020-21 and similar coverage is no longer available given the changes in the marketplace due to COVID-19. Management is exploring alternative solutions to pandemic risk management and will continue to monitor the impact of COVID-19 during fiscal-year 2021-22.”

The NCAA draws nearly all of its revenue from the Division I men's basketball tournament, beginning with its multimedia and marketing rights deal with CBS and Turner that is scheduled to pay the association $870 million in 2022.

The NCAA lost more than $800 million in multimedia and ticket revenue from the men's basketball tournament's cancellation in 2020, the financial statement said.

That was partially offset by the insurance payout, but the association ended up drastically cutting its distribution to Division I schools and conferences.

Those members received just over $246 million in fiscal 2020, compared to $611 million in 2019 and $613 million in 2021.

Even with the 2021 insurance proceeds, the association reported $36 million less in championships and National Invitation Tournament revenue not related to the CBS-Turner deal in 2021 than it did for 2019.

In prior years, that revenue amount had almost always increased annually.

The notes to the statement said that in May 2020, the NCAA obtained a $125 million credit line with PNC Bank. The association borrowed $100 million in fiscal 2020, then repaid it the same year. The NCAA let the credit line expire on May 1, 2021, but presumably could readily re-establish it.

Because of scheduled annual rights fees increases, growth in investment income and slightly lower expenses than it had in 2019, the NCAA operated at a nearly $122 million surplus in fiscal 2021.

Its net assets stood at $516 million at the end of fiscal 2021. That's its greatest total since the end of the 2015 fiscal year, when the total was nearly $700 million.

That was just before the NCAA board of governors approved a one-time distribution of $200 million to Division I members from what had been a quasi-endowment reserve and the association agreed to a $209 million settlement of the damages portion of the Alston antitrust case.

COMMENTARY

Commanders already need to retool their shoddy 'crest'

Nate Davis
USA TODAY

ARLINGTON, Va. – The Washington Football Team, known by another – infamous – name for 87 of the franchise's 90 seasons, finally unveiled its long-awaited rebranding Wednesday.

More infamy seems likely to follow.

Twitter may not be the most accurate canary in the coal mine, but the site's legion of users were largely unkind to the “Commanders” reveal – including what seemed like a large swath of the club's fan base.

An unscientific polling of my Gen-X friends, who have supported this team since its heyday in the 1980s, revealed apologetic reaction and disbelief a two-year process to reboot the organization birthed ... this.

(And, as a U.S. Army veteran, I can only hope Washington hasn't disenfranchised its significant base of itinerant military supporters by aligning with a rank – commander – unique to the Navy ... but that's neither here nor there.)

Navigating trademark issues, focus groups and historical considerations is no easy task. Still, the leaks – accurate as it turned out – on social media in recent weeks and from former Washington quarterback Joe Theismann on Monday left many hoping “Commanders” might be an elaborate ruse as opposed to a soft launch that gave the team's fans time to adapt.

That brings me to Washington's problematic “crest.” I fancy myself as something of a league historian and most certainly a uniform aficionado. The Commanders are touting their “crest” as, “A unique brand element within the NFL, Washington's crest features core elements of the team's identity and the franchise's defining moments.”

Uh huh. It's a soccer logo, y'all. Barf.

But, hey, even if you embrace such a thing – we Gen-Xers generally disavow soccer – I'd also submit this “crest” is screwed up.

Maybe you like the whole “Est. 1932” thing. (As Nicolas Cage's character uttered in “The Rock,” a 1996 classic, “You know, I like history too, and maybe when this is all over you and I can stop by the souvenir shop together, but right now I just ... I just wanna find some rockets!”)

Maybe you like the three stars in the bottom left quadrant, “representative of the stars on the DC flag and the team's position within the Nation's Capital.” Sure, maybe ... though this looks a lot more like Tennessee's state flag – reference the Titans' logo – than the District of Columbia's.

But what's really dumb are the five years noted in the bottom half of the crest's circular border. It will become quite untenable if the Commanders go all Patriots on us and render the font inscrutable with more championships, but that's an issue for the people of the 22nd (23rd?) century. What's really dismaying is, in addition to noting 1937 and 1942 – years when Washington did win NFL titles – that 1983, 1988 and 1992 are also listed.

Sigh. Yes, Washington technically won its Super Bowls in the calendar years 1983, 1988 and 1992. But the teams that did the work were the 1982, 1987 and 1991 editions. Ever heard anyone cite the excellence of the undefeated '72 Dolphins ... who won Super Bowl 7 in 1973? Do they call them the '85 Bears or the '86 Bears ... because the 1985 team won Super Bowl 20 in 1986. The NFL defines the Super Bowl era as beginning in 1966, the season that led up to what became known as Super Bowl 1 ... which was played in 1967.

Need I go on? While celebrating the NFL's 100th season two years ago and compiling a list of the league's 100 best teams, I ranked Washington's 1991 juggernaut No. 6 overall – and fans will correctly tell you it's an underrated squad, perhaps forgotten while wedged between the San Francisco 49ers and Dallas Cowboys dynasties.

Quoting me on the Super Bowl 26 champions: “After going 14-2 and outscoring their foes by 261 points in the regular season, they swept through the playoffs with an average margin of victory better than 20 points. The only Washington team to win a Super Bowl in a non-strike season, these underappreciated (former name) would have gone all the way in most years. They topped 40 points five times and blanked three teams, so excellent balance – and that extended to special teams and return man extraordinaire Brian Mitchell.”

Washington's 1983 team? One of the best in franchise history ... and one that was surprisingly drilled by the Los Angeles Raiders in Super Bowl 18.

Washington's 1988 team? Missed the playoffs.

Washington's 1992 team? Lost in the postseason divisional round, and then Joe Gibbs retired (the first time).

Yeah, so probably time for somebody to commandeer this rebrand to at least update the key details?

Washington football team unveils new name

Analís Bailey
USA TODAY

With a new name comes new uniforms.

After a two-season-long rebrand, the Washington Football Team has officially changed its name to Washington Commanders and unveiled new uniforms and logos.

The team has kept its traditional burgundy-and-gold color scheme.

“The ‘W’ on the front represents who we are, and we really are representing the DMV (District of Columbia, Maryland, Virginia) in its entirety,” franchise legend Joe Theismann said Wednesday during the team's name reveal.

“If you look at the emblems on the back, you see that we cover our history and the championships that have been won. We always want to leave space for one more Jonathan, so that we can put another date in front of it.”

Theismann directed his comment to current defensive tackle and Pro Bowler Jonathan Allen, who shared the stage with him as well as co-owners Dan and Tanya Snyder.

Aside from burgundy and white for home and road uniforms, the Commanders also unveiled an alternate black jersey and pants.

“As we kick off our 90th season, it is important for our organization and fans to pay tribute to our past traditions, history, legacy and the greats that came before us,” Snyder said in a statement. “We continue to honor and represent the Burgundy & Gold while forging a pathway to a new era in Washington. Today may mark the first day for the Washington Commanders, but we are and always will be Washington.”
