NBA

Westbrook-Harden: Rockets seek boost

Dan Wolken
Columnist
USA TODAY

It says something about the state of professional basketball when two All-NBA point guards get traded for each other and it registers only fourth among the balance-of-power shifting transactions that have taken place in the last month.

Mostly, it says the NBA has changed from a league where you need three superstars to win a title to a league dominated by power couples. And it says the Rockets, who a few weeks ago seemed to be contractually handcuffed to a point guard in decline alongside James Harden, were desperate to find a way out.

The Rockets sent a boatload of future draft assets to Oklahoma City on Thursday to swap the bad contract of Chris Paul for the less-bad contract of Russell Westbrook, throwing a different look at a Western Conference that seems to be wide open.

From a basketball standpoint, pairing a ball-dominant guard in Harden with a ball-dominant guard in Westbrook doesn't make a lot of sense on the surface. From a chemistry standpoint, it would seem to hold the potential for disaster. Yet what other choice did the Rockets have?

In a sense, this trade fits both the ethos of general manager Daryl Morey, who has relentlessly chased superstars with little regard for their personality fit, and an owner in Tilman Fertitta whose promises of major change after last season's second-round playoff meltdown made a lot more sense when you remember his first big foray into sports came as a blustery college football booster at the University of Houston.

With Harden's window still wide open at 29, this was the time to go for it. This was the time to dump Paul, 34, off on someone else before 2021 and 2022 when he'll make a combined $85.5 million as his physical decline accelerates. This was the time to use whatever assets the Rockets had to add a second superstar whose prime lined up more closely with Harden's.

But ultimately we still have this major question about Houston: Does swapping Paul for Westbrook solve the Rockets' fundamental problem?

Beyond the bet on pure talent, of which Westbrook has plenty, Houston is doubling down on the idea that two guards who primarily create shots for themselves will be better than one.

Given reasonable health, Houston is a lock to win 50 games, even in the rugged West. But it's undeniable at this point that the Rockets have a playoff problem with Harden, whose shooting percentages have dipped from between 44% and 45% in each of the last four regular seasons to 41% in each of the last four postseasons.

When so much of Houston's offense relies on Harden to score one-on-one, make ridiculous step-back jumpers and draw fouls, it seems obvious he's being forced to do too much.

The issue going forward is whether Westbrook helps solve that problem or makes it worse. Because we've already seen one iteration of a team where Westbrook routinely took a sledgehammer to the hierarchy of who was supposed to do what when the stakes were highest, and it wasn't particularly flattering to him in Oklahoma City.

If Westbrook didn't defer enough to Kevin Durant in the big moments, why would we expect he'll do it with Harden? If Westbrook wasn't particularly efficient in playoff games for Oklahoma City – his career 3-point percentage in the postseason is 30.2% – why would we expect it will change now?

Though reports have indicated that Westbrook pushed to be traded to Houston and that he and Harden wanted to reunite, they are in much different places now than they were as younger players with the Thunder.

Both of them have won league MVP awards. Both of them have spent the last few years as the clear-cut alpha dog of their teams having to share very little of the credit or blame. Both of them have been empowered to take whatever shot they wanted.

Can Houston still be Harden's team if he doesn't have the ball in his hands for the majority of nearly every possession? Can Westbrook be as effective if he's playing off the ball while knowing he won't get it back? Will two stars with tunnel vision to score be able to coexist peacefully when their desires overlap?

The answer is probably not. But for Houston, which clearly felt it wasn't going anywhere with a diminished, banged-up Paul, there was no other choice but to try.

League's 5 best duo list gets a makeover

Scott Gleeson
USA TODAY

The NBA's free agency period shook up the landscape of the sport. While many teams bolstered their respective rosters' depth, the base of an NBA championship team still almost always has two superstars, such as Michael Jordan and Scottie Pippen of the 1990s Bulls or Kobe Bryant and Shaquille O'Neal of the 2000s Lakers. With newly revamped rosters, here's a look at the best duos in today's game (injuries aside).

1. LeBron James and Anthony Davis, Lakers

Davis has been trying to team up with James since last season, when he was fined for his agent requesting a trade. The partnership, which will feature a twilight-of-his-career James and an in-his-prime Davis, came to fruition in a blockbuster trade that left Los Angeles' roster bare outside of rising star Kyle Kuzma. But the Lakers' front office recovered to put together valuable pieces around that core to make this team a legit championship contender, even with Kawhi Leonard choosing the next-door rival.

James hasn't played with a big guy this good his entire career and has two to three seasons of great basketball left to capitalize on. The inside-out game will be driven by James' passing and Davis' athleticism around the rim.

2. Kawhi Leonard and Paul George, Clippers

Leonard shocked the NBA world when he helped broker the deal that sent George to the Clippers, giving the championship-less Los Angeles franchise two top-five players who are among the best scoring wings in the game. Pairing the two versatile forwards together gives the Clippers a dynamic duo who will draw just as many fans to Staples Center. And the Clippers' supporting cast is on par with the Lakers' and will be a force defensively, making Leonard's and George's team a title contender, not just a team with two MVP candidates.

3. Kevin Durant and Kyrie Irving, Nets

Even though it's unlikely we get to see this Brooklyn tandem on the court together next season as Durant recovers from an Achilles injury, when they do play together fans will see two of the game's best players teaming up after already showing they have chemistry during Team USA's 2016 gold medal run in the Rio Olympics. Durant and Irving both left storied franchises in the Warriors and Celtics and then chose the Nets over the storied Knicks, so that shows both players are hungry to define their own legacy free from the pre-written storylines.

4. James Harden and Russell Westbrook, Rockets

This reunion of teammates happened as part of the chain reaction from George leaving Oklahoma City, making Westbrook tradable from a rebuilding franchise. Trading Westbrook for Chris Paul gives the Rockets a more athletic and dynamic backcourt, even if the chemistry is hard to initiate with two ball-dominant guards. It also gives Houston the 2016-17 MVP (Westbrook) and 2017-18 MVP (Harden). In a newly reshaped Western Conference, these two talented pieces make the Rockets a contender.

5. Steph Curry and Klay Thompson, Warriors

Even though Thompson will miss most of the 2019-20 season recovering from a knee injury, when he does return the Golden State backcourt that won three NBA titles and reached five consecutive Finals will have an opportunity to silence doubters who believe the Warriors' era is over. Those two were at the forefront of turning Golden State into a title team, and they'll be front and center for the franchise's next chapter.
